Nothing Is Lost, Nothing Is Created, Everything Is Transformed

FOR THE FIRST EVER, THE QUEBEC TRIENNIAL HELD AT MONTREAL'S MUSÉE D'ART CONTEMPORAIN, PRESENTS A WIDE RANGE OF EMERGING ARTISTS SHOWING ALL THAT ART IS THESE DAYS — WELL HONED, INFORMED, TRENDY AND TRAINED — A CROP OF ART FOR THE EVERYDAY AND A DISPLAY OF DIVERSITY IF EVER THERE WAS ONE.

Among the 135 works of art on view in this show curated by the MACM's Paulette Gagnon, Mark Lanciòt, Josée Bélisle and Musée National des Beaux-Arts du Québec's Pierre Landry, there is the feeling of a change in contemporary art. These are definitely trained, educated, well schooled artists with a sense of the mediated role art can play in society. They know their materials. They understand what art should look like. They produce art. In fact, some of them humanize an altogether post-human situation. Such is the case with Doyon-Rivest's Lopopagus (2008), a Siamese twin-like business consultant or some such creature. He's fuzzy, friendly, harmless, and a mascot of and for every occasion. As they say, “Lopopagus” is a friend to children, animals, lost causes, defenders of the environment, and so on. Julie Doucet's art looks like art, and cut and pastes its way through the imagery and text with persona. One text piece reads: “Pourquoi devons-nous nourrir reproduction dans la communauté humaine des lors sans avenir?” Sometimes these works are sentimental, tinged with insights into the mediatized dilemmas of living in a post-production, consumer society. She is so Montreal!

David Altmejd, perhaps the best known in this show, has two colossus-type figures. They are devolutionary structures, monumental and awkward, fragile. Altmejd's Bosch-like figuration, so well known to many, captures beauty for a minute, only to turn it ugly. Its a duality that the propagandists of our era would prefer we believe, for it enables further manipulation of form, image, human. The Dentist, Altmejd’s other giant is made of mirrors. One cannot help but think that Altmejd sourcing is Biblical, but a sort of Twisted Sister Biblical immersed in a decorum of nature and artifice. There are quail’s eggs set into the sides while the smashed mirrors facing carries potential echoes of a presumed (media or artist?) violence. Animal teeth project out in places from the mirrors, and we have regressed back to social Darwinism, or is it the Nature vs. Nurture conundrum? Altmejd has something topical to say, without a doubt. After all, we ourselves are nature, aren’t we?

Anthony Burnham’s sculptures are all about art and objecthood and revel in the everyday, touching these elements up, painting them, always with a sense of the presence of these forms in space. In his sense his works surprise us with their historical consciousness, sense of art’s past lineage, but he does it all his own way. At the video room near the entrance to the show, one can see an array of artists’ productions including Patrick Bernatchez’s surprising set-ups. One of these, I Feel Cold Today, involves a ride up an escalator to an office that fills up with snow. While the atmosphere and music that accompanies the pieces recalls the 1960s, the sense again is of an artist recapturing sentiments and feelings from other places, other times. This is interesting when we compare it with West Coast video, for nostalgia permeates this show, even if you can’t put your finger on it sometimes. Chrysalide: Empereur, another of Bernatchez’s videos, captures a man smoking behind the driving wheel of a car that is slowly filling up with water. He is wearing a Ronald McDonald outfit. Its a clever topical tragi-comic quip and brainless too! And as we all know brainless is in, particularly in an era of global corporate conquest.

No Brainer, an image from British-born Adrian Norvid’s Organ Bore is but part of a sincerely expressive young artists amazing comic graphic imagery. Hermit Hamlet Hotel, is a hippy getaway in a post-modern era. This enormous graphic caricature has a Robert Crumb feel but has free form fun with gratifying referencing of everything, even if the subject is nothing and goes slowly and predictably nowhere. I even like the organ sculpture. This guy reminds me of George Grosz for his insidious prevaricating wit lost in a sea of boredom. I thought I saw a product package under or near the pedals beneath the organ. Was it all just a dream? Yannick Pouliot’s videos follow the strange configurations of orate classic furniture in narrow spaces he created, some of which were seen at MACM recently.

Valérie Blass, to my mind, is one of Quebec’s strongest emerging artists and with her own point of view. Any of her sculptures reveal this to be true. A lightning stroke sculpture projects out from a wall but it is covered in hair or is it fur? A neo-mythological nature morph has hoofed legs and a lion-like head. The totemic vertical forms in Distortion et alignement animalier (2007) have a synthetic electrical cabling material whose outer surface has colour lines. Blass leaves us guessing what objects she has vacuum-sealed beneath the surface coating. Etant donne, le Loris perce sur son socle neo-classique (2008), presents hybrid standing figures. One is a hoofed animal with a lion-like face. Blass comments: ‘My inspiration comes from a 17th century caricature that made fun of those wigs that look like a lion’ mane. The structure is treated like a bronze, with the emphasis on the posture and physical bearing of the figure, and the endless waves that form the muscles and the sculpted hair. There is practically no face. The second figure seems almost alive. Two adjoining modes of representation. A real, little animal is perched on an antique sculpture.”

Tightly orchestrated, well presented, Nothing Is Lost, Nothing Is Created, Everything Is Transformed is unquestionably one of Canada’s best visual art shows seen in quite a while. While the art is somewhat too trained, and has none of the social depth one hopes for, maybe these artists are working in reverse from earlier generations. Let’s see what happens with their art in the future! □
