PRESUMED UNKNOWN...

Always on the lookout for new talent, this edition focuses on the unknown artist... but as you can see, the definition is mitigated by the word “presumed”, for to be unknown is relative.

Some of the artists profiled have already established a name for themselves elsewhere, and are only “unknown” to the Canadian public. Others have been toiling at their art for some time but have yet to see recognition. And others still, are at the beginning of their creative path, emerging, as it were, into the light, and scrutiny.

Their choice of medium and subject matter is as diverse as their backgrounds, and each will draw the reader into a unique universe.

We present South African artist, Ashley Johnson, and his anthropomorphic, disturbing paintings that speak of large issues of society and our place in nature. Juxtaposing these images is the virtual world of computer art by Brenda Cleniuk, and portrait photographs of the gay scene by Toni Latour. James Lindsay takes on military topography in his colorful, abstracted paintings, while Stephanie Weirathmueller offers her personal take on the quotidian in her canvases. Young Montreal artists, Maskull Lasserre and François Carrier, bear the banner of the new generation, with works that are at once spontaneous and grounded in artistic principals. Avant-garde artist Mitchell Chan seeks inspiration for his work in mythology, while photographer Karen Stentaford has an eye for finding the surreal in nature. The art of Pascaline Knight, a true find at my own doorstep, is as much inspiration for the theme as one of its many variations.

The issue also includes reviews of two major exhibitions by very different artists: Philippe Lacelin-Bellefleur and Jim Dine.

And finally, a report from the 53rd Venice Biennale focuses on the work of Canadian representative, filmmaker Mark Lewis.

Art is not what you see, but what you make others see, said Edgar Degas, and it is our hope that all these artists will make you see and reflect upon new sensations. It is the nature of art to open our eyes not only to what surrounds us, but also to what is within us. In some cases it will take courage, in others, it will happen on its own, like the emergence of a symbolic butterfly in Pascaline Knight’s as-yet-unfinished art book.
