DONALD GRANT CREIGHTON, 1902-1979

Donald Creighton was truly an exceptional historian. His publications, beginning in 1937 with a work which has become a landmark in Canadian historiography, The Commercial Empire of the St. Lawrence, are a remarkable series of seminal books and articles. The Dominion of the North in 1944 proclaimed the coming of age of Canadian history and was soon followed by the much acclaimed two volume biography of John A. Macdonald (1952 and 1955) which established Donald Creighton as a scholar of international renown. The Road to Confederation in 1963 drew together the social and economic themes in his earlier study of British North America at Confederation and added a delightful recreation and expression of society and politics at the founding of the new nation. His personal statements of Canada's more recent history, Canada's First Century (1971), and, subsequently, The Forked Road (1976), the final volume in the prestigious centenary series of which he was also the advisory editor, ended an era of nearly forty years in which Donald Creighton's works shaped and influenced the very writing of Canadian history. In addition to this impressive array of accomplishments, Donald Creighton was also a memorable teacher, advisor and friend to countless students during a teaching career at the University of Toronto of nearly half a century. During this same period he found time to write a very sensitive biography of his colleague, Harold Adams Innis, as well as an affectionate introduction to Eugene Forsey's Freedom and Order. In 1972, Macmillans, whom Professor Creighton always referred to as "his publishers," gathered together that marvellous collection of Creighton's essays and speeches, Towards the Discovery of Canada.

Much of Donald Creighton's scholarship was devoted to national history, or, as some would have it, to politics. There is an unmistakable emphasis on Parliament and its policies, party gains and losses, constitutional issues and party tactics, cabinet appointments and disappointments as well as the rise and fall of politicians and their governments. Yet his perceptions went far beyond politics and political history. It is not without significance that Canada's First Century begins with a description of the nation's new capital, Ottawa, and of the economic and social forces that had created it - "A small, northern frontier town, set at the edge of a vast expanse of territory that still awaited occupation and development, it was in many respects a miniature of the new nation as a whole." In Creighton's view, one of the most striking features of Canada's history since confederation was the development of major urban centres which dramatically changed the character and texture of the new nation. Cities became the social expression of the new industrial Canada, containing both the economic power and the social influence that had come to dominate the country.

As a teacher Donald Creighton urged students to look beyond conventional explanations and to be ever alert for new evidence and new approaches to the study of history; his own awareness of the impact of urban development provides an innovative example of the practicality of his advice. Those who have read the detailed description of Montreal's urban design and the aspirations of its Anglo-Saxon commercial elite in the Empire of the St. Lawrence have no doubt about Donald Creighton's relevance to urban history. The opening section of volume 1 of the Macdonald biography also provides a vivid illustration of Creighton's awareness of the importance of the themes with which urban historians concern themselves. His description of the urban landscape as well as the social, economic, intellectual and political forces in the Kingston of Macdonald's youth is quite striking:

There was a grey, sober, earnest, downright yet not ungracious air about it.... Many of the shops and houses of Kingston were built of limestone ... and the flat grey shop fronts, with their rows of pleasantly spaced sashed windows, climbed in slowly ascending levels up Store Street from the harbour. Despite its smallness, the town had an eighteenth-century urban appearance, an old fashioned inclination towards regularity and symmetry and perspectives, which was to yield only slowly and partially to the violent idiosyncracies of Victorian stone and brick-work.

Similar vignettes appear throughout the Macdonald biography, describing the unmistakable character of Quebec City and Toronto in the 1850s and Ottawa as the nation's new capital in the 1860s and 1870s.

These descriptions of the urban landscape evoke a strong almost dramatic sense of time and place, illustrating Professor Creighton's belief in history's close affinity with literature and his perception that history must be narrative and descriptive as well as analytical and expository. In his view the historian's role was to make clear and vivid the setting in which historical themes are developed. Donald Creighton's history was neither narrowing nor restrictive; his scope was broad and varied, encompassing a wide range of interests. By his own definition the historian's search for evidence should be comprehensive and exact; scrupulous care must be used in its evaluation and applied with all the rigours of a science. To this Donald Creighton added a breadth of vision and an unrivalled narrative skill which has left a legacy that will assure his place in the history of Canada.

GUIDE TO THE HISTORY AND RECORDS OF SELECTED MONTREAL BUSINESSES BEFORE

Anyone even remotely interested in Canadian business history - and this should include all urban historians - will welcome the appearance of A Guide to the History and Records of Selected Montreal Businesses before 1947. Published by the Montreal Business History Group, a small band of scholars associated with McGill University, and funded by the Bronfman Family Foundation, the P.L. Fund and various Montreal universities, the Guide is a compendium of descriptive entries of privately held records relating to some 107 Montreal businesses.

The work is not a duplication of information available elsewhere in publications like the Union List of Manuscripts or the Directory of Business Archives in the United States and Canada. It is, instead, the result of an ambitious canvass of over 1,400 companies which were in business in 1946 and earlier or which are likely to have absorbed such firms. Two hundred businesses responded to the enquiry, and from the affirmative respondents, together with a number of later converts, permission was received to compile an inventory of archival holdings held in company offices. It is these inventories, coupled with useful historical sketches, which compose the published work.

The Guide also gives the outside dates of the material in each inventory, access information, the address of the company and a description of the documents. Included in the work are some of Montreal's most important businesses and a considerable number of less significant companies. Regrettably there were more than a few notable non-participants, but despite these absences, the Guide is an admirable achievement and a model for groups in other centres to follow. And the price is right: the Guide is free! Requests should be directed to the Montreal Business History Project, Centre de recherche en histoire économique du Canada français, 5255 Decelles Avenue, Montreal, Quebec, H3T 1V6.

GUIDE POUR L'ETUDE D'ENTREPRISES
MONTREALAISES ET DE LEURS ARCHIVES
AVANT 1947

Quiconque s'intéresse de près ou de loin à l'histoire des milieux d'affaires canadiens - et ce devrait être le cas des spécialistes de l'histoire urbaine - accueilleront avec plaisir l'ouvrage intitulé Guide pour l'étude d'entreprises Montréalaises et de leurs archives avant 1947. Publié par le Groupe de recherche sur l'histoire de la Communauté d'affaires à Montréal, petit cercle d'érudits associé à l'Université McGill, et financé par la Fondation Bronfman, le Fonds P.L. et diverses institutions d'enseignement supérieur de Montréal, le guide se veut un recueil de données descriptives tirées de dossiers privés portant sur 107 entreprises de Montréal.

Ces données ne sont pas une reprise de l'information contenue dans d'autres publications comme le Catalogue Collectif des Manuscrits ou le Directory of Business Archives in the United States and Canada. Elles sont plutôt le résultat d'infatigables démarches auprès de plus de 1,400 sociétés qui étaient en activité avant 1947 ou qui ont vraisemblablement absorbé de telles entreprises. Deux cents d'entre elles ont accepté de participer à l'enquête et, grâce aux nombreuses réponses affirmatives, le groupe a pu dresser un inventaire des fonds d'archives conservés dans les bureaux d'entreprises. Le guide regroupe donc les données de cet inventaire ainsi que quelques anecdotes intéressantes.

Le guide comprend également les périodes couvertes par le matériel répertorié, les renseignements d'accès, les adresses des entreprises et une description des documents. Il y est question de quelques grandes sociétés de Montréal et d'un grand nombre de compagnies moins importantes. On y trouve des lacunes regrettables (le secteur du vêtement, les professions libérales, quelques grandes entreprises), mais le guide n'en est pas moins un ouvrage admirable et un modèle pour tous les groupes intéressés par ce sujet. N'hésitez surtout pas à vous le procurer, car le guide est gratuit. Il suffit de vous adresser au Groupe de recherche sur l'histoire, Centre de recherche en histoire économique du Canada français, 5255, avenue Decelles, Montréal (Québec) H3T IV6.

URBAN ARCHITECTURE

The ever-growing list of titles dealing with urban architecture in Canada has recently been lengthened by the appearance of John H. Lutman's The South and West of London: An Historical and Architectural Guide (London: City of London, 1979). Published by the City of London under the auspices of its Local Architectural Conservation Advisory Committee (LACAC), this modest, eighty page volume presents an outline of the history of the areas and delineates three tours of the South. Individual buildings of architectural merit in both the South and the West are identified and described. The text is amply illustrated with photographs, while five maps at the back make the material intelligible to an outsider. The South and West is the third in a series which has included Reflections on London's Past (1975) and The Historic Heart of London (1978), and for $3.95 it may be obtained from the Office of the City Clerk, City of London, City Hall, London, Ontario. Local residents may also obtain copies from London booksellers.

URBAN LABOUR HISTORY

The Labour Studies Programme at McMaster University has recently published the memoirs of two trade union activists, whose stories should be of interest to students of the urban past.

Organizing Westinghouse: Alf Ready's Story is a sixteen page illustrated account of a fun-loving and mischievous organizer who learned all about pranks and people as a child in Hamilton's "North End." The first chapter of the memoir provides a nice portrait of this self-enclosed, British immigrant community.

Miner's Life: Bob Miner and Union Organizing in Timmins, Kirkland Lake and Sudbury, a seventeen page illustrated memoir, gives something of the flavour of the 1914-1930 period. Miner was especially sensitive to the countervailing thrusts of a pioneer and a company town.

Each publication costs $2.00, with discount rates for orders of ten or more. They are available from the Labour Studies Programme, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, L8S 4K1.
