

New Mexico Summer

Karen Tallkat Conley

---

Volume 32, numéro 2, 2016

Radical Ecologies in the Anthropocene

URI : <https://id.erudit.org/iderudit/1042994ar>

DOI : <https://doi.org/10.7202/1042994ar>

Aller au sommaire du numéro

---

Éditeur(s)

Athabasca University Press

ISSN

1705-9429 (numérique)

Découvrir la revue

---

Citer ce document

Conley, K. (2016). New Mexico Summer. The Trumpeter, 32(2), 191–194.
<https://doi.org/10.7202/1042994ar>

New Mexico Summer

---

Karen Tallkat Conley

Blue, blue sky
mountain red rocks,
Bright sky with no end to it.
Soft breeze ignites bird
on a tall pine tree top
to sing
a solo love song,
calling her mate to join the lofty position
she has chosen
near the sun.

We grew our own food—
berries, tomatoes and greens.
On our land
wind chimes, like church bells called attention to the life within all things.

Now
I dream, as an elder
with conscious imagination, deliberate intention applied to the great adventure which lies before me, the life between lives.

For the next generation

I project my imagination to their future dreaming.

Southwest memories

of our earth's high desert sanctuary

where we

once lived.

Of songbirds,

wild things

and blue cloudless mountain skies.

Bushy ten-foot sunflowers

that seeded and

sustained themselves.

They grew wild and tall,

declaring their independence

along dusty back roads,

or

in abandoned fields,

as far as the eye

or imagination could see.

This strange magical land where

bright desert flowers

and
cactus fruits
purple, yellow, and blue
appear unannounced every summer
just in time
for the
hummingbirds.

Fat lizards napped,
basking
on hot, ancient jagged rocks that transform into
shadowy,
spooky
by night rock formation
creatures.
Silent, in an out of balance, seemingly
artistic arrangement.

For the future, I hold a memory of the uneven
private places
where we lived.

Lavender blending
with peach tree
blossoms
on the hill.

Original desert perfume released only after
summer rains,
combined warm earth,
piñon, pine and cedar.

This land
where mountain sage
rode the wind
and
grew freely, in between rocks
like a blessing.

Wild
and
unintended