The Tower of Babel

Nicholas Nordenson

Volume 21, numéro 85, hiver 1976–1977

URI : id.erudit.org/iderudit/54970ac

Citer cet article

THE TOWER OF BABEL

By Nicholas NORDenson

Harold Rosenberg's most recent collection of essays was published under the title, Art on the Edge. This title expresses the author's concern that the plastic arts are close to "the edge that separates them from the crafts, commercial design and the mass media". Rosenberg is being generous in his diagnosis. In recent years the plastic arts have been crossing borders as if they didn't exist, followed closely by critics, collectors, dealers, museums and art historians alike. The latter group are possibly the prime culprits.

This century has seen the eruption of a mass consciousness of history. Marx changed people's way of thinking about the extent that we are no longer merely living our lives; instead we are all of us making history, all of us playing our roles in an inevitable class struggle. Similarly artists are no longer making art; instead they too often spend their time trying to make their contributions to art history. This is evidenced by the current obsession with precise dating, often to the day.

The dangers of this history consciousness are manifold. Artists are forever trying to second guess in what direction this increasingly absurd tradition is next going to turn — instead of trying to express anything profound, beautiful or sublime. A good example are the American Edward Ruscha's anti-photography books, produced early in the nineteen sixties. Five 1955 Girlfriends consists of five very ordinary portrait photographs of five women, the common link being their chance encounters with the artist. Unless one is a student of the history of women's hair styles, the photos are of almost no interest; no hint or clue of how they relate to two thousand years of Western art making. The photos would have appealed to Ruscha because they were taken merely to record information, without any of the ordinary art overtones. He claimed (Artforum, February 1955) that the photographs he uses are not "arty" in any sense of the word, that plastic art is a fine art", that he considers his photos to be "technical data like industrial photography". He continues: "I want absolutely neutral material. My pictures are not that interesting, nor the subject matter. They are simply a collection of facts..." The artist is able to claim from art history that he has no mandate to reduce art making to a neutral presentation of arbitrarily selected information.

Another danger of this history consciousness is that an obsession with the temporal axis has blinded people to the fact that this ridiculous tower of babel has spread its branches in all directions, encroaching on the territory of countless other disciplines. The other axis — where the plastic arts stand vis-à-vis all other areas of human activity — have largely been ignored, allowing artists to cross borders and enter into the realm of countless other areas.

One of the primary messages of the conceptual art movement of the nineteen sixties has been that artists who are free of objects are also free to move outwards in all directions. This message continues to be loudly broadcast.

Borders are problematic. Exactly where the line is drawn always seems an arbitrary decision; things are generally very similar both sides of a border, making it hard to discern just when it has been crossed. Borders are elusive — they exist, nevertheless. If I go far enough south from Montreal, I will eventually find myself in the United States. No matter how arbitrary the exact location of that border might seem to be: it's there none the less. And it's for the good, my claim, that it doesn't exist. The remainder of this article will attempt to find some of the reasons for this lack of purpose.

Whatever else it may be, art is always a faithful social barometer. It accurately reflects the direction in which the society in which it is practiced is heading. This is especially true of the conceptual art movement. This phenomenon is no less true of the films of Bruce Nauman are outside the borders of the plastic arts (although that is true); all one need do is point out that they are within the borders of film. Then scrutinize them according to the rules of film criticism.

However this does not happen. Films, music, books, plays, novels, poetry, philosophy, religion, anthropology: all have received wide acceptance as being plastic art, and one has to ask why. How has it come about that dealers and critics alike have applauded loudly as the plastic arts have spread out in all directions? The answer has to be that art has lost any common notion of what art is, this sprawling out just would not be possible. The remainder of this article will attempt to find some of the reasons for this lack of purpose.

If everything is now art, then of course art does not exist. By so changing the definition of art, Duchamp succeeded in destroying art for more effectively than he could ever have imagined would be possible. The plastic arts have crossed borders into countless different areas, but the region they once occupied stands barren, deserted.

ATTENTION! C'est le temps d'acquérir

des lots d'anciens numéros de la revue encore disponibles

Lot de 30 numéros  $30 seulement

Occasion offerte jusqu'à épuisement des stocks. Pour les commandes postales, port en sus.